EDITORIAL

A Greatly Beloved Man
Every person in this section of Virginia will be genuinely grieved by the illness of our beloved, our great friend, Hon. Robert F. Hutcheson. Possessed of those beaming traits so happily associated with a true Virginia gentleman, our judge is a man whose friends are legion and whose the exalted office holds. We wish for him a speedy return to complete health.

With Fear and Trembling!
Learned scribes in Richmond, Atlanta, Montgomery, Raleigh, and other cities of the eastern United States, are frequently using the editorial columns to editorialize on the art of the kitchen. It takes a stout heart to venture into this sacred realm of the nation-making Goliath. But we cannot refrain from exposing our own taste by the assertion that Virginia other than of the Southfield variety is ALSO quite palatable.

It is a scintillating because at bottom the subsidies are designed not to increase crops but to keep farmers on the farm. What has happened to farming everywhere in Mr. Drucker's view, is industrialization and the coming of the machine. The large-scale production of bulk commodities—the grains, cotton, etc.—the machine, division of labor, etc., has taken the place of the small-scale intensive farming—pottery, dairying, fruits, vegetables, such things as "cheese," "silk," "wine," etc., which represent the individualism of the individual.

Mr. Drucker is none too optimistic about the ultimate solution. It is true that the machine cheapens the price of food by increasing production; what the consumer pays out in subsidies, seen and unseen, goes to some degree to be balanced by reductions in food costs, so that he can eat even. But the political and sociological values of the independent and individualized farmer are nevertheless being lost. There is talk, of course, of saving them by "industrializing" the farmer, by substituting agriculture for the extension of cooperatives. Mr. Drucker says self-support, by substituting farming simply isn't feasible, and the co-operative is a mere tool, not a formula for salvation.

Of course, what Mr. Drucker says about the machine on the farm is pretty much what the ruins of the old Southfield have always said. It does increase and cheapen production, in doing so it drives older economies and displace older crafts. If the maintenance of the farmer as an individual class and a craft is more important than the increased efficiency of industrialized food production, we shall have to resist that kind of production. If, on the other hand, the production of more and cheaper food is considered paramount, it is still somewhat early to consider finding consumers for it. There are a good many hungry people left in the world. While they continue hungry it will seem to many paradoxical to reduce the production of food. Anarchy now obtains in world trade, to be sure; but perhaps we'd better not despair of reducing that anarchy until Mr. Hull himself has finally given up.

It is a sad thing to be told in the midst of battle. It is quite another thing to be fearless in the quiet of one's own room, or of one's own heart. Satan is expert at that. He comes to us with his humiliating accusations of our unworthiness, yet, of our unworthiness, of our own knowledge of ourselves confirms his judgment.

But wait. If we are Christians we are not our own. We are bought with a price, the precious blood of Christ. We belong to Him. He is our advocate with the Father. Let Him meet our accuser. What does He say? He tells us that He has numbered the very hairs of our head (v. 30), that even a sparrow concerns Him, and that we are worth more than many sparrows (v. 31). We are His and He is our Saviour, Friend and Brother. Let us look up and be without fear.

III. Fearless in Personal Life (v. 23-31).
Here, after all, is the acid test of discipleship. Christ did not come in order to stir up needless strife between members of the family. But He well knew that divisions would come as the result of true discipleship. Men who are ordinarily kind and cultured in their dealings with their friends and families but who do not know Christ, can become like veritable demons against any one who stands between them and their idols. No human tie, no matter how intimate or precious, is to be permitted to stand between the individual and his devotion to Christ. If it is, He is no longer Lord of all in the life, and if He is not Lord of all, He is not Lord at all.

While it seems almost paradoxical to say it, Scripture teaches and experience demonstrates that if you keep your life for yourself and your own interests, it will lose it. If you give your life in dedication to God, on the other hand, you will receive it back from Him transformed, enriched, and glorified by His grace and blessing.

Jefferson, Democracy (From Eastern Shore News)
In his remarks at the laying of the cornerstone of the Thomas Jefferson Memorial, now under construction in Washington, President Roosevelt called attention to Jefferson's "what the average opinion of the people is the true opinion of the people." That is, we think, the essence of democratic philosophy and the foundation stone upon which rests our form of government. The people, certainly, upon occasion, the people can make mistakes but if human activity is designed for human welfare it is vitally important that the individual be free to express his opinion. It often happens that damage is done but "the long run" is the judgment of mankind is responsive to changed conditions and will able to determine what is best for mankind in general. A dictator-power, whether lodged in one man or a special class, may act with greater efficiency and with more wisdom on occasion but, "in the long run," it will not be responsive to the needs of all people, although it may preserve the special privileges of the chosen few.

E. Leo Trinkle's Death
Anybody who has many pleasant memories of E. Leo Trinkle, ex-governor of Virginia, who died this week in Richmond. One of the truly great public speakers of his time, he spoke here on a number of occasions, and always with appreciative audiences.

His administration as governor was overshadowed by that of Harry Flood Byrd, who followed him. He made many worthwhile advances in state efficiency, appointed Harry F. Skelley to the highway body, and ardently advocated more funds for public schools. Elected governor as an "argonaut" candidate, he was nevertheless one of the first to come out in support of the candidacy of James H. Price, and it had been rumored that in event of a Senate vacancy, Governor Price might be appointed. Mr. Trinkle's life was cut short at 63. He was fearless, able, and of gracious charm.

"Bewilderment." That is the word which the president of a great American university recently said accurately described the present condition of the minds of men. Little wonder that the men of the world are bewildered, for they are like mariners who sail an unknown sea after having thrown away map and compass. Without Christ and without God's Word man cannot be anything but bewildered.

Quail seem to be plentiful, and there are some turkeys, but nothing like it was before the state took charge of all game and made the game laws "for the special benefit of the city sportsmen." The writer will remember the time when turkeys were much more numerous than tame turkeys. Several would come some times with the farmer's flock of tame turkeys home to roost at night. The largest turkey rooster the writer has ever seen was hatched from an egg taken from a wild turkey hen that was shot in the spring season of the year. It was as tame as any house cat and, I think is weighed nearly 40 pounds.

Many is the time when a boy on my father's farm, I saw flocks of turkeys to 20 wild turkeys of an evening, hurriedly on their way to their roosting place. It was said of a young man of this county that he stalked a flock of turkeys and marked their roost in the tall forest. There were numerous in those days. The moon being about full, he secured his father's old single-barrel, muzzle-loading gun while the rest of the family was asleep, and took himself to the tall tree where he supposed the turkeys were roosting. Sure enough, he soon espied a dark object between himself and the moon. Taking careful aim, my friend fired point-blank at the "turkey" which he thought he had secured. Securing his prize, he hurried home, where his family, having heard his shot, were awaiting his arrival. Imagine his surprise and consternation, when they found he had secured a turkey buzzard!

"Build-Up": Way to Ease Women's Pain
Many weak, run-down women are a vicious circle. Their under-nourishment often leads to what is called functional dysmenorrhea and its symptoms—headaches, nervousness, irritability, intermittent cramp-like pains—often from which many women suffer. Sufferers may break the vicious circle by building strength and energy, which so many find may be done with the help of CARDUI. It stimulates appetite, aids digestion, and thus helps in this "build-up" of physical resistance. CARDUI also helps to ease the pain and discomfort of the period.

Westside Evergreen Items

(Omitted last week)
Westside Evergreen, Nov. 22. Having had a second installment of Indian summer last week, we are having a spell of real winter weather this week.
After two days of intermittent rain, last night and today, Wednesday morning the day before Thanksgiving, is ushered in at Evergreen with the first real snow of the season.
True, there has some snow here before this, but it melted as it fell. The fact that Thanksgiving day has been moved up one week earlier than heretofore will not prevent a white Thanksgiving.

There has been some hunting in this section, but nothing like it would have been had the weather been clear.
